Taming the Wilderness

by Dave Traller

"Don't try to make us out to be glamorous," says Yorke Brown as we talk in the backroom of Pavilion XI. "Rescue is not glamorous or romantic. Most of it is drudgework. A man who has never done it won't accept it. He might use the phrase, 'I can't stand dirty work.'"

But the fact remains that the Blue Ridge Mountain Rescue Group is a dedicated, hardworking group of volunteers who perform a valuable service to the community.

The group is comprised of volunteers who are trained in a variety of skills, including first aid, search and rescue techniques, and wilderness survival skills. They are always on call to assist in situations where their expertise is needed.

The group is always looking for new members, and anyone interested in learning more about the group can contact them through their website or social media platforms.

The Blue Ridge Mountain Rescue Group is a testament to the power of community and the dedication of its members.
